

ACCOUNT SUMMARY

This account has been converted to a new number or was closed at your request. To access information related to your new account, register the new number and access it with your same user ID and password. If you have any questions regarding your account, please contact our Customer Service Center.

CitiBusiness® / AAdvantage® Select card - 0-17

Current Balance:	$0.00
Revolving Credit Line:	$35,600.00
Available Credit Line:	$0.00

PAY NOW

QUICK LINKS

View Unbilled Accounts

Make a Payment

View Statements

Add Employee Card

Annual / Quarterly

Manage Alerts

American Airlines® AAdvantage®
Miles

VIEW MILES EARNED

IMPORTANT: Comment on the Citibank Statement

This customer started the process in June of 2014, and the statement is dated 1-14-15, so it was about seven months. That's about the average amount of time it takes to have the collection efforts of the pretender lenders and their agents to go away. The statement shows "Current Balance: $0.00". That's the key information. Everything else the statement says is irrelevant. The account was NOT "converted to a new number". The "balance 0" does in fact show that they are admitting that the debt is cancelled. However, it would be cancelled anyway, whether they were open enough to admit it in writing or not.

It's nice that they confirmed it in writing, but it doesn't matter. The debt was cancelled whether they put it in writing or not. Usually they don't. The only way most people know, is that the collection efforts stop. If the pretender lenders were to put too much in writing to too many people, showing debts had been cancelled after it had been exposed and challenged by our documents, then their house of cards would collapse a whole lot faster than it already is. It's just nice that once in a while they do provide a hint in writing.

A "hint" is the best we can expect -- meaning "balance 0", but no other explanation. They're most certainly not going to come right out and admit that no loan was really ever made, that "You're right, we're sorry, we committed fraud, and we never had even a penny at risk when your credit was created out of thin air." That would be like a nuclear bomb on the empire that the cabal built on the sand. It would be correct and truthful, but they're not going to say it. The most they have ventured to say, in rare cases like this one, is that the balance is zero, or like in the other one you might have seen on our website, from Transunion, that the debt was "deleted".

Nevertheless, like the old saying goes, "for the wise, a hint is enough".